Accused swindler Starr invested in ‘private CIA’

By Jeff Stein

Kenneth I. Starr, the disgraced financial adviser with an A-List stable of Hollywood clients, was a major investor in GlobalOptions, a controversial Washington firm that once billed itself as “a private CIA,” financial filings show.

Starr is charged with swindling at least $59 million from a glittering list of film and media stars including Uma Thurman, Al Pacino, Martin Scorsese, Neil Simon, newscaster Diane Sawyer and photographer Annie Leibovitz.

Federal agents found him hiding behind coats in his closet on May 27, "forcing them to yank him out by the collar," the Associated Press reported.

Starr “was an early investor in GlobalOptions,” according to a former employee. SEC filings show that he had major investments in the company as recently as January 2009.

Since its founding in 1998, GlobalOption’s board of directors has also included Starr’s son, Ronald, who is also managing director of his father’s investment firm.

So many of Starr’s clients were stockholders in GlobalOptions that the company felt compelled to tell the SEC that the cross-ownership “would not interfere with [Starr’s] independence, as defined by Nasdaq’s rules and regulations.”

GlobalOptions was founded by Neil C. Livingstone, a behind-the-scenes adviser to Reagan White House official Col. Oliver North during the arms-for-hostages deal with Iran. Livingstone left the company in late 2006 to start a similar firm, Executive Action LLC, headquartered in Dupont Circle. He took GlobalOptions' "private CIA" with him.

“Think of us as a McKinsey & Company with muscle,” a brochure for Executive Action says, "a private CIA and Defense Department available to address your most intractable problems and difficult challenges."

While Livingstone was still CEO of GlobalOptions, the firm said its foreign clients operated "primarily in Russia and the Caribbean,” according to an SEC filing unearthed by Harper’s magazine blogger Ken Silverstein in 2007.
One was Ukrainian businessman Dimytro Firtash, who “brokered several billion-dollar deals between Gazprom and the government of Ukraine,” which drew “criticism from the U.S. ambassador to the Ukraine at the time for the deals’ lack of transparency,” according to the Wall Street Journal.

Now headed by Harvey Schiller, a former sports and broadcasting business executive and onetime executive director of the U.S. Olympic Committee, GlobalOptions today stops short of advertising itself as “a private CIA.”

But the heart of its business remains in security services and corporate intelligence.

“With a single call, through a single point of contact,” the company’s brochure says, “you can access our entire array of international risk services – from security and investigations, to disaster preparedness and management, to fraud prevention and litigation support.”

The company did not return a call seeking comment.

Livingstone, reached by telephone Friday, said he is no longer privy to the internal workings of GlobalOptions, but doubted the firm was damaged by the collapse of Starr’s financial empire.

“I don’t think it will hurt them,” he said.

Livingstone, who was once accused by GlobalOptions of stealing the firm’s clients -- “it was settled in my favor,” he said -- also said none of Starr’s clients invested in Executive Action.

The Paris-based newsletter Intelligence Online reported Thursday that GlobalOptions “carried out numerous missions on behalf of Kenneth Starr and his clients” when Livingstone ran the company.

But Livingstone, now mulling a run for governor in Montana, his home state, described the “missions” as “the routine problems and issues that show business people get into” -- stalkers, missing children, accusations of sexual dalliances, property stolen by household help and the like. “Mundane stuff, nothing spooky or unusual,” he maintained.

Two principals of GlobalOptions, former FEMA chief James Lee Witt and former New York City police commissioner Howard Safir, recently announced their departure from the company, shortly before the Starr indictment was handed down.

The company’s advisers have included such national security luminaries as former FBI directors William S. Sessions and William H. Webster (who also headed the CIA in the 1980s), former CIA director James Woolsey and former NATO commander Wesley Clark.

Did Ray Davis Shoot Two Pakistani Agents?
Pakistani Officials Claim American Killed Men Working for ISI

BY NICK SCHIFRIN
Feb. 9, 2011

The public narrative from the United States is simple: one of its diplomats in one of the most dangerous countries in the world was threatened by two men with guns, and the diplomat shot and killed them in self-defense. He sits in jail, "illegally detained," because he enjoys diplomatic immunity.

But the version of events told by multiple Pakistani officials -- and adamantly denied by the U.S. State Department -- is utterly different.

The four Pakistani officials who spoke to ABC News on the condition of anonymity say that the two men who Raymond Davis killed in Lahore last month were working for Pakistan's premiere intelligence service, and they were following Davis because he was spying.

If true, their story dramatically changes the nature of an incident that is already severely straining the two countries' already tumultuous relationship. Davis's detention is fraying the U.S. alliance with Pakistan, one of the most delicate and important in the world. U.S. and Pakistani officials both admit the fate of Raymond Davis could threaten an alliance that is critical to the war in Afghanistan and the fight against al Qaeda.

According to the Pakistani officials, the two men had been sent to track Raymond Davis by the Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI, which believed that Davis had crossed "a red line" and needed to be followed.

In late January, those officials say, Davis was asked to leave an area of Lahore restricted by the military. His cell phone was tracked, said one government official, and some of his calls were made to the Waziristan tribal areas, where the Pakistani Taliban and a dozen other militant groups have a safe haven. Pakistani intelligence officials saw him as a threat who was "encroaching on their turf," the official said.

Men Followed Davis For Two Hours, Says Official

Davis was traveling through a lower middle class part of Lahore on Thursday, Jan. 27, when the incident took place. The men he shot had been following him for at least two hours, one of the Pakistani officials claimed, and recorded some of his movements on their cell phone cameras. Davis has a U.S. Special Forces background and runs Hyperion Protective Consultants, LLC, a company that provides "loss and risk management professionals."

The U.S. embassy in Islamabad refused to respond to questions about why Davis was armed, who he had been calling, or whether he was found in a sensitive part of the Lahore cantonment.

That the ISI sent the equivalent of two hired guns to trail Davis is a sign that the relationship between the U.S. and Pakistani intelligence agencies is at a low point, according to all four officials quoted in this article. In October, the ISI helped reveal the name of the CIA station chief -- inadvertently, according to a separate, senior Pakistani official -- forcing the station chief to leave the country.

The two men's alleged connection to the intelligence services was first reported by a Pakistani newspaper, the Express Tribune.

The U.S. has also threatened Pakistan’s military with cutting off some of its aid if Davis is not released. Last week, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, Rep. Buck McKeon, R.-California, traveled to Pakistan and met with Gen. Ashfaq Kayani, the Pakistan Army chief of staff, as well as Prime Minister Yusuf Raza Gilani.

McKeon and the congressional delegation pointed out that U.S. anger could extend to the floor of the House if Davis is not released -- and that could threaten the Pakistani military’s more than $2 billion in aid per year.

McKeon said that he "could foresee a member of Congress coming to the floor and offering an amendment to strike military funding for Pakistan," an aide to the House Armed Services Committee told ABC News.

U.S.: Pakistan Fears Unrest if Ray Davis Released

The U.S. officials who deny that the men Davis shot were intelligence officials believe Davis is being held despite his diplomatic immunity because of fears that releasing him might cause domestic unrest. He is being held in Lahore, the capital of Punjab province, where Zardari's chief political opponent controls the provincial assembly. Some of the government's political opponents -- as well as some parts of the Pakistani media -- benefit from stories that suggest U.S. contractors or spies operate throughout the country.

The Pakistani officials agreed with that, acknowledging that Davis' release could at least temporarily weaken the federal government and spark protests in Lahore and perhaps across the country.

Adding to the pressure on Pakistan not to release Davis, the wife of one of the men he killed committed suicide Sunday by taking a tablet usually used to keep grain in a silo from going bad in the winter. When she first arrived at the hospital she was still able to speak, and her doctors allowed television reporters to interview her. She released a diatribe of hate to describe why she swallowed the tablet.

"I do not expect any justice from this government," Shumaila Kanwal said. "That is why I want to kill myself."

"I want blood for blood," she said. "The way my husband was shot, his killer should be shot in the same fashion."

Last Thursday, Davis appeared in court without a translator and without prior notification to the U.S., the Islamabad embassy said in a statement. U.S. officials say those events convinced them Davis could not receive a fair trial in Pakistan. The judge extended his detention for another eight days. He is next scheduled to appear in court on Friday, Feb. 9.
